The tower, which stands at the south-cast angle, is composed of three stories, the two lower ones of which were dungeons, approached, as is the case in most of the castles of the 14th century, by oeillets in the vaults above them. The floor of the lowest must have been about 50 below the level of the ramparts of the castle. A more melancholy place of confinement can hardly be imagined. The upper story forms a refectory. The floor of this apartment is on a level with the rampart, which here is not more than three feet above the general level of the ground. It has a waggon-headed vault, and is lighted by three deeply embrasured windows, with semicircular heads internally, and square heads outside. In a reveal of a window on the west side is the door of a staircase in the thickness of the wall. This leads to an upper apartment, probably a dormitory. The corbels which supported the floor of this room still remain at the springing of the vault. The walls throughout are 6 3 thick. This tower was erected by Englishmen, whose shields are seen in a row over the door, twenty-three in number, with the following bearings: --The arms of England with a crest upon a mantled helm above the shield; three other shields have the same charge with differences; on the rest are the arms of Montague, Stafford, De Vere, and other English families. 0 The national...
